Lookingglass Theatre Company
CM: David, what first drew you to adapt 20,000 Leagues Under the Seas?

David: Back in 2011, fellow Ensemble Member Phil Smith and I were sitting in the theatre during a break from tech for the play I co-wrote and directed, The Last Act of Lilka Kadison. We were brainstorming a future production, and started thinking about how the theatre itself feels like a submarine with all of the working pipes in the pumping station. I suggested a new adaptation of 20,000 Leagues Under the Seas. Laura Eason had done a fantastic adaptation of another Jules Verne work, Around the World in 80 Days. Plus, Lookingglass already had a good track record of staging the impossible.

CM: Steve, what excited you to dive into this project?

Steve: Three reasons: David, Lookingglass, and the story itself which has been imprinted on my brain since seeing the Disney picture in re-release in the early ’70s. 20,000 Leagues Under the Seas is the masterpiece of one of the primary creators of modern science-fiction. There’s an enormous amount of new scholarship now about Jules Verne, and he’s benefited the past decade from retooled—much more faithful—translations. In many ways, he’s an author being rediscovered.

CM: What do you hope audiences will take from this play?

David: On an entertainment level, this story is the same hardcore thriller it’s been for over a century: Victorian submarines, sea battles, hairbreadth escapes. And on a deeper level, the story really has grown into a near-parable in many ways more resonant to our world than to the world for which it was originally intended. We’ve passed all speculation, and we are able to do all of the things that Captain Nemo does—and with considerably more firepower. So, wrestling with the moral responsibilities of science developed for destructive use is very clear and present for us in a way that, perhaps, it wasn’t in the 19th century. That said—they are the same responsibilities Verne brought up in the first place.
CM: You have changed the gender of the protagonist of the story. The scientist, Aronnax, and Aronnax’s companion, Conseil have been changed from male to female, what was the inspiration for this?

David: Well, Verne’s original text featured all men, and we were experimenting with ways to broaden that. In talking with Steve, and inspired by female Victorian writers who took on male nom de plumes in order to be published, we landed on the idea of making Aronnax just such a person. It gave us some fun things to play with and provides a different breadth and depth to the proceedings.

Steve: We were both intrigued by what conflicts might arise for Aronnax if she were a woman writing as a man, a la George Sand—who was actually Amantine Dupin. Dupin was a great friend and fan of Verne’s—and it’s believed she was the one who encouraged him to write a book about undersea exploration.

CM: Talk a little about what it’s like to workshop movement and physical sequences for a new play.

David: Lookingglass has an awesome relationship with the Actors Gymnasium up in Evanston, which is run by Lookingglass’ Artistic Associate Sylvia Hernandez-DiStasi, who has choreographed many of our shows. There, we got to work with some of the production and design teams to play around and stage physical sequences in the show. It’s one of the most fun parts of the process, experimenting with all the ways we can tell the story.

JUNE 24
Jules Verne and Victorian Sci-Fi:
With his fantastical journeys into deep oceans, earth, and space, the famous French author may be the inventor of Science Fiction. How has Verne’s work influenced other books, films, television, and plays?

JULY 8
Just Beneath The Surface: Captain Nemo’s Nautilus is an early and fictional forerunner of the real-life modern submarine. What do today’s explorers and scientists use to gaze into the ocean’s depths?

JULY 15
Creatures From The Deep!: Jules Verne’s sea creatures take on legendary proportions in many popular films, television, and theatrical adaptations. Learn about their real-life counterparts with scientists from Chicago’s Shedd Aquarium.

The Fate of the Oceans: Like Captain Nemo, Jules Verne was a fierce admirer of the oceans and all that they hold. What new challenges are posed by oceanic warming, rise, and pollution, and how can we save the seas for future generations?

JULY 29
The Politics of Destruction: Captain Nemo commits acts of violence in the name of a greater good. Is one man’s environmental activist another’s eco-terrorist? Is violence ever warranted, or even effective?
